Developing and Implementing an Outward Mindset

Utah Local Governments Trust

Results are driven by strategically aligned behaviors, which is why organizations devote so much time and so many resources trying to encourage beneficial behaviors in their employees. However, behavior itself is driven by something else—by the underlying mindsets in the organization.

Organizations populated by people who have more or less the same mindset as they've always had will continue to produce more or less the same results as they've always produced. Attempts to improve behavior alone can produce marginal improvements, but breakthrough results require a change in mindset. This is Arbingers work: changing mindset. Specifically, helping individuals, teams, and organizations to change from inward mindset orientations to outward mindset orientations. The Trust believes that developing outward mindset has a direct impact on our pool.

When acting from an inward mindset (the Box), people focus on themselves and their own objectives. They want others to behave in ways that will further those objectives. They focus on what they themselves do and measure their success by what they themselves accomplish.

When acting from an outward mindset, on the other hand, people work to help others be successful—their customers, for example, their coworkers, their managers, and their direct reports. They focus on their impact on what others are trying to do and measure their success in terms of what others are able to accomplish as a result of their efforts.

In this workshop we will explore in detail how it is that we can end up in an inward mindset, the implications of that in our work, and the impact on others. We will also leverage a framework that will guide us to work in an outward mindset.
